“ For the last three years I have had first hand view of the toll Alzheimer's takes on a wonderful person and their families. It starts with the small things, like forgetting to take medication or forgetting grandchildren's names. It goes to waking up in the morning and he is wondering why he's in your house. Then your up at 3AM out in the driveway helping him realize that the Airforce didn't call and put him on alert, that he doesn't have to report for duty. Then you have great days of normal time and you wonder is this really what's happening, you have family get togethers and he seems to be really enjoying himself. He goes to the door, hugs his Great Grandkids good bye. Then you come back in the house and he ask who were those people and why were they here.

You look up and three years have gone by. Your having normal Saturday night conversation at the supper table. The next night he's in the hospital and then a few days later the doctors tell you that his brain has quit telling his body to swallow food. Last night we lost a wonderful, kind man. Cindy lost her dad that she has spent the last years caring for. Today he is TOM, he knows where he is, he remembers Monica. He walks without a cane and he waits for the day that we see him again!
